INTRODUCTION – WHEN A PHONE COMES BETWEEN TWO PEOPLE

Some relationships do not end because there is no longer anything between the two people. They end because they can no longer be together in the way they need to be.

Today, there can be a third “person” between two people that is not actually a person. It is the phone.

It lies on the table during dinner. It is in a hand during a conversation. It is beside the bed. It is present on holiday, during a visit, while watching a film together, and even at the moment when one partner needs to say something important.

The phone itself does not destroy a relationship. The problem arises when its use repeatedly comes between two people and pushes out attention, conversation, shared time, and closeness.

This book is not an indictment of technology. A phone can connect us, help us at work, protect us in an emergency, and make everyday life easier.

However, a device that was meant to make relationships easier can gradually begin to receive more attention than the person sitting beside us.

And that is when it is worth stopping.

Not to look for someone to blame.
